Historical Context of Colonial Families

The colonial period in America began in the early 17th century, with the establishment of permanent settlements. The Formation of Colonial Families

Colonial families were typically nuclear, consisting of parents and their children, although extended family members often lived together or nearby. The structure and dynamics of these families were influenced by several factors:

- Food and Nutrition: Colonial diets were based on what could be produced locally. Common foods included corn, beans, squash, and meats. Preserving foods for winter was essential.
